THE NEW ADMINISTRATION. President Garfield is no more, and President Arthur reigns in his stead. The death of Louis MIV, was announceed by the Captain of the body-guard from the window of the State Department. Raising his truncheon above his head, he broke it in the centre, and, throwing the pieces among the crowd, exclaimed in a loud voice: "The King is dead." Then, taking another staff, he flourished it in the nir as he shouted: "Long live the King!" This incident has been shown of much of its dramatic

In the clear light of this familiarity with and approbation of Garfield's policy President Arthur's Administration opens. With the details of the home policy of our Government foreign peoples are not apt to be familiar. Hence the present situation is entirely exceptional. Every step taken by President Arthur will be watched abroad as well ing attention, and it is certainly not too much to say that the measure of success of the new Administration will depend upon the closeness with which it shall follow in the footsteps of the late President.
